“At Northeastern University School of Law, we believe in forging strategic alliances with other leading academic institutions to broaden and deepen the possibilities for our students. We combine these dual-degree opportunities with our unique, experientially based legal education, so that students benefit from both top academic training in specialty fields and four full-time co-ops where they can put learning into practice.”

DEAN EMILY A. SPIELER
Northeastern University School of Law and Brandeis University’s Heller School for Social Policy and Management have joined together to train lawyers who can serve as development planners and policymakers in the United States and abroad. The combination JD/MA in Sustainable International Development is an accelerated four-year program, including combined law/international development co-op externships, providing students with experience in applying the law in an international development context.

Working together, Northeastern and Brandeis are building field placements around the world. Students may also qualify for fellowship support through the law school’s Program on Human Rights and the Global Economy.

Together with dual-degree partnerships at Vermont Law School and Tufts University School of Medicine, this program provides Northeastern students with opportunities to work toward a sustainable world, free of environmental degradation, poverty and preventable disease.

Examples of co-ops in the sustainable international development field include:
- Alternatives for Community and Environment, Boston
- Centre on Housing Rights and Evictions, Geneva, Switzerland
- Ceres, Inc., Boston
- Conservation Law Foundation, Boston
- Global Justice Center, New York
- Global Rights, Washington, DC
- Human Rights First, New York
- International Consortium for Law and Development, Boston
- International Rescue Committee, New York
- Liberty, London (England)
- National Center for Law and Economic Justice, New York
- National Law Center on Homelessness and Poverty, Washington, DC
- Oxfam America, Boston
