Introducing the Program on Health Policy and Law
Northeastern University School of Law announces the launch of a new interdisciplinary Program on Health Policy and Law, bringing together faculty and students from across Northeastern University to address pressing problems of public health and health care delivery.

This innovative program provides a rich resource for faculty and students interested in public health law, health and human rights, health governance, intellectual property, bioethics, health care delivery law, and the regulation of our health care systems. It is guided by faculty with diverse areas of expertise — including law, pharmacy and nursing, economics, business administration, African American studies and philosophy.

The program focuses Northeastern’s worldwide leadership in experiential learning, urban engagement and interdisciplinary research to offer a broad curriculum to students in health and public health law; expand multidisciplinary research opportunities; sponsor conferences, lectures and colloquia; build experiential opportunities for students; deliver workshops to introduce students to career opportunities in health law and policy; and guide student activities, including the law school’s Health Law Moot Court team and the Health Law Student Association.

It is also affiliated with the law school’s JD-MPH dual-degree program with Tufts University School of Medicine.
