

Notes on Contributors
Volume III, Number 1

Maurice T. Cunningham is Assistant Professor of Political Science at the University of Massachusetts at Boston. His research is focused on Massachusetts politics. He is the author of “Catholics and the ConCon: The Church’s Response to the Massachusetts Gay Marriage Decision,” Journal of Church and State 47 (winter 2005) and “A Christian Coalition for Catholics? The Massachusetts Model,” forthcoming in the Review of Religious Research. He also is the author of Maximum, Whatever the Cost: Race, Redistricting and the Department of Justice (Westport, CT: Praeger, 2001) and “Historical Eras in Choosing the Nation’s Civil Rights Enforcer,” which is published in the Journal of Political Science.

Rajesh Kumar teaches political science at PPN College, Kanpur, Uttar Pradesh, India. He specializes in India-Pakistan relations, United States policy towards South Asia, and the media’s impact on the Indian political system. He most recently has published a monograph on the ways in which nuclear weapons have influenced India-Pakistan strategic relations.

James T. McHugh is Professor of Political Science and Director of the Legal Studies Program at Roosevelt University, Chicago, where he also teaches political philosophy. He has published numerous articles and books on American and comparative constitutional law, Canadian politics, Quebec politics, political philosophy, and international law. A fourth-generation native Vermonter, he also has a special interest in the history, politics, and culture of that state.

Clyde McKee is Professor Emeritus and former Chair of the Department of Political Science at Trinity College. His long experience and expertise in legislative and electoral politics includes a special research interest in Connecticut politics and government. He also established the first legislative internship program in the United States.

Bilal Sekou (aka Darryl L. McMiller) is an assistant professor of political science in Hillyer College at the University of Hartford. His research interests are race and politics, urban politics, and campaigns, elections, and voting behavior. He has published articles on social and political participation by African Americans and public attitudes toward quality and integrated education in Connecticut.