

Notes on Contributors

Edward Clayton is an assistant professor in the Department of Political Science at Central Michigan University. He received his doctorate from the University of Michigan and specializes in Greek and Roman political theory, democratic political theory, liberalism, and communitarianism.

David Da-hua Yang is a doctoral candidate in the Department of Political Science at Princeton University. He specializes in comparative democratization, social stratification, ethnic mobilization, and research methods. His doctoral thesis will address the social basis of “third wave” democratization.

Richard Drew is a doctoral candidate in the Department of Politics at the University of Virginia. His specialties include American constitutional law, judicial politics, and political theory.