Chase Strangio is a staff attorney with the ACLU's LGBT & HIV Project. He has been involved in numerous high-profile cases, including serving as counsel for Chelsea Manning in her lawsuit against the Department of Defense for denial of health care related to gender transition and was part of the team that organized around her commutation. He has also worked on lawsuits challenging North Carolina's infamous anti-trans laws, HB2 and HB142, and on Gavin Grimm’s trans rights case before the US Supreme Court. He is currently part of the legal team at the ACLU challenging President Trump's ban on open military service by transgender individuals. Strangio is frequently quoted in national media outlets such as The New York Times, Time magazine and MSNBC, and was recently profiled in Mother Jones. In his free time, he organizes around ending cash bail and hangs out with his kid.
