JAMEEL JAFFER is Deputy Legal Director at the American Civil Liberties Union, and he oversees the ACLU’s work relating to free speech, privacy, technology, national security, and international human rights. Since he joined the staff of the ACLU in 2002, Jaffer has litigated many leading cases relating to national security and human rights, including cases concerning surveillance, torture, rendition, and “targeted killing.” In 2004, he obtained one of the first rulings striking down provisions of the USA Patriot Act; five years later, he led the litigation that overturned the exclusions from the United States of Swiss scholar Tariq Ramadan and South African political theorist Adam Habib. He has also litigated some of the most significant recent challenges to government secrecy. He co-led the litigation that resulted in the release of the Bush administration’s “torture memos,” and more recently he led the litigation that resulted in the public disclosure of some of the Obama administration’s “drone memos.” He has argued in multiple appeals courts, as well as in the U.S. Supreme Court, and he has testified before Congress on multiple occasions concerning issues relating to counterterrorism policy and civil liberties. In recent months, his writing has been published in the New York Times, the Guardian, and Politico; he also writes regularly for Just Security, a national security blog. He is a graduate of Williams College, Cambridge University, and Harvard Law School.
