Course Description:
This is an “advanced property” course that will examine property doctrines and theories that decenter the right of exclusion. We will read both legal cases and scholarship to examine the idea of sharing as a core norm in property law. We will explore the developing “right” to share in contexts such as climate adaptation, neighborly relations, access to housing, and the platform economy. We will scrutinize its doctrinal development through property rules such as servitudes and zoning. The course will be discussion-focused, and students should be prepared to share their reactions to the readings both in class discussions and in writing throughout the course.
